A Many-Sided Man-Edward Everett Hale, McClure's Magazine.

When I came back Dr. Hale was again stretched upon the lounge. He began almost hercely upon his favorite topic, and I can do no better than to give his own words:

"I have written twenty-five books, but I'm not an author; I'm a parish minister. don't care a snap for the difference between Balzac and Daudet. That isn't important in life. I do care about the difference between the classes of men who migrate to this country of mine."

Here I interrupted him: "Is it better to do twenty things than "Not best for every one; but for a man who writes forty sermons a year, it is better not to get into a rut. To write those sermons well be must come into touch with forty things or forty men. As a man of letters. I say the same thing. An author must be an all-around man and take a many-sided view of life. My friends think it harms me. I say it does not."

The Inducement

say there was a spark there.'

The inducement to put adulterated preparations on the market lies in the fact that a large part of the purchasing public is always ready to accept the cheapest that can be had, without thinking that the quality of the article must be cheapened in proportion to the reduction in the price demanded. Housewives can better afford to

For they are pure and reliable
